Exhibition
27 March – 18 May 2013

Press view
Tuesday 26 March 2013, 10am – 12 noon, talk at 11am

Iniva (Institute of International Visual Arts) in partnership with Tate Liverpool, presents Keywords, an exhibition and talks programme based on Raymond Williams' study of the vocabulary of culture and society, drawing on iconic works from the Tate collection together with key loans. Artists include Sonia Boyce, Willie Doherty, John Dugger, Rita Donagh, Sunil Gupta, Mona Hatoum, Lubaina Himid, Inventory, Derek Jarman, Louis Le Brocquy, Gustav Metzger, Donald Rodney, Guy Tillim, David Wojnarowicz, Stephen Willats and Carey Young. The talks programme includes speakers Linda Bellos, Leo Bersani, Douglas Crimp and Geeta Kapur.

First published in 1976, 'Keywords' is a seminal work in the study of the English language. It contains over one hundred and thirty short essays, giving an account of each word's current use, its etymology, and the range of meanings attached to it. Williams understood 'Keywords' as those words that repeatedly crop up in our discussion of culture and society, its institutions and practices, including terms such as: democracy, reform, consumer, ideology, industry, liberation, popular, unconscious and art.

Raymond Williams said that he often wished some other 'form of presentation could be devised' for his project, a format which would reflect how words form networks of meaning in relation to one another, instead of in an alphabetical list. This exhibition attempts to invent such a format, by considering words through works of art, which come together in 'clusters' in order to explore, interrogate and expand their meaning.

Spread across two locations, Iniva in London and Tate Liverpool, the exhibition is put together from the Tate collection and includes works from 1976 (the year of the book's publication) to the present, with an emphasis on the 1980s and early 1990s. In addition, a film programme curated by Kodwo Eshun will include seminal works from this period in a separate gallery screening. As well as reflecting the meaning of specific words, the selection of artworks also hopes to have an affinity with Raymond Williams' ethos - his political concerns, his progressive understanding of the arts, his contribution to cultural studies and its relationship to the multi-cultural society emerging at that time which was transforming Britain as well as the English language. Any contemporary study of English words must take into account how the language has been shaped by exposure to other cultures, through historical processes of colonisation and migration, through American English, and through the emergence of Diaspora communities and cultures, which have transformed the language from within, subverting the mainstream and producing the English which is spoken in 2013.

A new series of words including theory, sex and equality, will be explored in an ambitious new Keywords talks programme spanning London and Liverpool. A free workshop at Iniva, led by Adrian Rifkin with Christian Nyampeta and Rebecca Bligh, will invite the general public to develop their own words which will become part of the Keywords project online.

Keywords is curated by Grant Watson, Senior Curator and Research Associate, Iniva and Gavin Delahunty, Head of Exhibitions and Displays, Tate Liverpool and presented by Iniva, the Institute of International Visual Arts in London and Tate Liverpool. Works in the exhibition will be brought together in a structure designed by artists Luca Frei and Will Holder.
